Performance

Based on transaction prices, the fund's return was -0.64%.

Robeco BP US Premium Equities trailed the Russell 3000 Value in July, with both sector allocation and stock selection detracting from relative returns. Sector allocation was the primary driver of underperformance. The top-detracting sectors were information technology (overweight), utilities (no exposure), healthcare (overweight). Utilities was the top-contributing sector for the index during the month. Importantly, despite information technology detracting, fund positions outperformed index positions during the month, but detracted due to the overweight exposure. From a stock selection perspective, consumer discretionary, healthcare and industrials were the top-detracting sectors. Within consumer discretionary, not holding Amazon, which was recently added to the index, was the top detractor, as the stock climbed higher by 7%. Healthcare providers and services businesses weighed on returns during the month as Centene, Sanofi and Cigna fell 38%, 6% and 19%, respectively. Industrials lagged as a result of not holding Caterpillar, which climbed higher by 13%. On a positive note, information technology contributed positively from a stock selection perspective, led by Oracle (up 13%)

Market development

US equity markets climbed higher in July, as investors turned in favor of growth names following a strong earnings season. While geopolitical conflicts, tariff turmoil and economic pressures remained intact over the month, investors favored a risk-on environment, rather than risk-off, favoring growth-oriented businesses. Information technology led returns for the S&P 500, followed by utilities, as energy demand continues to rise with the application of artificial intelligence. NVIDIA reached the highest recorded market cap in history during July.

Expectation of fund manager

Markets performed well in July, as earnings reports were fairly strong for the second quarter. Despite a slight resurgence of market concentration, value-oriented strategies look favorable compared to the growth side of the market, which continues to see valuations climb higher, reaching levels similar to (if not in excess of) the tech bubble. As always, we remain focused on selecting companies from the bottom-up that reflect Boston Partners' three-circle characteristics – attractive valuations, solid business fundamentals, and identifiable catalysts.

Top 10 largest positions

Medtronic and Alphabet entered the top ten holdings, while Check Point Software and Sanofi exited the top ten.
